Unrelated question...what's the opinion of sucking up resin shavings in a dust collector while turning? Is it dangerous, being that there is so much static electricity generated?

17:55:11 From Kelly:
Replying to "Unrelated question....."

i don't know if it is supposed to be dangerous - but ive done it for years with no issues

17:55:15 From Doug Miller in Kentucky:
You have the static issues, but you also have a possible issue of the shavings wrapping around the impeller and causing issues there.

This is a pretty controversial topic. There is much too much air in the column of a dust collector for the dust to reach the lower explosive limit (LEL) to ignite. This tends to start arguments. I don't want to do that. So I'd suggest you do your own research on it.
