Do you always use branch wood for your goblets ? Would you recommend it. rather than a 2.5x2.5
x12 slab wood

16:42:35 From Martin Clarkson:
Dont normally ask questions but i dont make goblets

16:42:46 From Ruby Cler:
Replying to "Do you always use b..."

I always make sure I'm using wood in spindle orientation - the grain is running parallel to the lathe bed

16:43:06 From Matt Harber - DAW - Highland, MI - Goblets!:

I typically will use branch wood, because I can get natural edges on the goblets.... as long as the pith is stable enough to be a part of a thin stem. But blanks like you describe work very well also.

17:13:27 From Matt Harber - DAW - Highland, MI - Goblets!:
I've discovered that it's a lot easier to hide small imperfections if your goblet stems are curved - with straight ones, any slight imperfections are obvious.

17:13:38 From Steven Twydell:
Doug you might have mentioned it before, but obviously the size and weight of the cup has to be considered when deciding on a thin stem right ?

17:14:02 From Ruby Cler:
Reacted to "Doug you might have ..." with

17:14:15 From Matt Harber - DAW - Highland, MI - Goblets!:
Not necessarily - with the outward tension, you have a lot more room to make bigger and heavier goblet bowls.

17:14:37 From Matt Harber - DAW - Highland, MI - Goblets!:
..... but thinner and more delicate looks better on thin stems.

17:14:58 From Steven Twydell:
I mean the weight ratio so the cup doesn't bow the stem Matt ?

17:17:18 From Albert Dawson:
I'm almost ready to have a heart attack. That is thin

17:17:23 From Steven Twydell:
A few here have mentioned turning a piece like this from branches, but pith needs to be taken into account as some are a weak point in grain structure, so a thin stem won't hold its own weight

17:17:58 From Dale Slaughter Horseheads, NY:
power out again

17:18:07 From Dane Chandler - PC:
